Announcing the PEN South Africa Student Writing Prize Winner

PEN South Africa is very excited to announce the winner of the PEN SA Student Writing Prize. We ran this competition because we believe in the power of writing to effect change and inform the way we see the world and ourselves. We also believe in the talent and power of young South African writers. As PEN SA President Margie Orford said when the shortlist was announced, "These clear and welcome and articulate new writers distil and give form to the student movement that is changing and shaping a generation."

Winner: Koleka Putuma for "Water"

Second place: Sithembiso Khalishwayo for "The Forgotten"

Third place: Puleng Lange-Stewart for "A love poem to the 'Problematic' Black Womxn"

Suzanne Nossel: To fight 'hate speech,' stop talking about it

Suzanne Nossel, executive director of PEN America, has written an article interrogating the term "hate speech", which references the proposed South African Prevention and Combating of Hate Crimes and Hate Speech Bill:

Hateful speech is a real thing. But "hate speech" is an incoherent concept that confuses more than it clarifies. In recent weeks, pundits, critics and pols have found ways to label all of the following "hate speech": anti-vaccination trolls on a California state senator's Facebook page; racist, homophobic and anti-Semitic tweets in France that are the subject of a lawsuit aiming to get Twitter and YouTube to take down the offensive materials; a reference to "Japs" by U.S. Rep. Peter T. King (R-N.Y.) during a talk-show interview; and Republican anti-Muslim and anti-Mexican sentiments called out by former first daughter Chelsea Clinton. A viral hashtag this week, #IStandWithHateSpeech, held that mainstream media companies were censoring readers' views.

We should forever fight the phenomenon of hateful speech in its many forms, but it's time to retire the term "hate speech." Its meaning is inexact, elastic and often misunderstood. If we want to combat the harms of distasteful, denigrating and dangerous ideas, we need precise tools and precise terms...read more
